New Scoring Proposal

The Competition Committee has published their final proposal to change our scoring method. While some of the small points are likely to be debated in meetings to come, the move from a simplified ranking to a rating of the individual pictures is welcome. The committee did a great job to identify the key problems of the “old” system and come up with something that looks like it will work well. Of course, it all depends on the actual scoring performance of the designated judges and the trust the members will have in the judges’ scoring. We will likely need some workshop for all the members on how to score, including what parameters to consider and what weight to assign to each. The wide swing in point assignment in our current scoring shows me that we have a real need to get aligned. Bob Ebersole tried an excellent approach a couple of years ago, when he was President. He had one member show a couple of slides and had three designated judges discuss the pictures and score them in front of the other members. Simple but very effective. Maybe we should try that again?

Tip Of The Month:

What is a RAW file?

So you are “shooting RAW”? For all good reasons to be sure but do you know what is in a RAW file and why do you really need to know?

After the image is captured by the sensor in your camera, a RAW file is generated. This file has three parts:

- A preview jpeg file. This is the image you can see on the playback screen on the back of your camera. It is also the image that first comes up on your computer on Camera RAW or other software until the converter process is completed. In Camera RAW you will see a little yellow triangle while you are looking at the preview image.
- A metadata file (technical camera shooting information). This information provides the converter processor with direction on how to handle the sensor data.

- A mosaic picture file. This is the “real” raw data right off the sensor with measured light data from each of the sensor pixs.

The RAW file with all this stuff remains unchanged on your hard drive. The RGB image file you generate in Photoshop (jpeg, TIFF, or whatever) is saved for printing, screen display or web gallery.

Is this a tip or just a bunch of tech-talk? It is information you really need to appreciate before you make the decision to switch from your current “file browser” approach to “catalog filing” which ADOBE is now promoting for pros and serious photographers who shoot a lot of pictures in RAW. More to follow...
